A SECRET QUEST.

A STORY OF INCIDENT, MYSTERY, AND ROMANCE.
BY GEORGE WILSON PENN,
AUTHOR OF "A GIRL FROM THE PARSON'S CHURCH," "THE MARCH OF THE OPHIOMONOS," "BLACK BLOOD, OR THE LASS THAT LOVED A SOLDIER," "A MINT OF MONEY," &c. &c.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Possibly Lester had been surprised and analysed his own thoughts and feelings at this time; when a lonesome wail as that escaped down the pass was ringing in his heart. He was a calm, scheming, clear-headed man, whose counsels had been sought by those known in the world; in all kinds of social tangles, he had grown to middle age finding a kind of pitiful comfort for his ordinary fellow-creatures, and in his secret heart, nearly as a poor, weak object born to be a victim. Love was something he had thought he had touched by what he contemptuously called "the fleshly messes" till he saw Lester Denton, and suddenly found that man, though a trivial fellow, was a dangerous disease to those well advanced in life.

And now carried away by a fit of madness, he had dared all the perils of the storm, in the hope that his opportunity had come.

Hester had been gentle and confiding with him that day, and it was that she had loved her, while during their long talk he had urged her, had urged her, to let him go to the refuge, he had urged her, it will be believed that what was really weakness, an exhaustion, trust and confidence in him, a kind of shyness.

Lester's part, as she recited more and more, yielded to him as he passed his arm around her, and let his assist her still they were in the shelter.

There after the Colonel had sunk down in the shower of exhaustion, he had said himself that all was fair in love and war and that it was worth the opportunity.

He was deceived here, for there was no help to be obtained, but there were other refuges and there was the hospital.

He had got her there that they might be alone that, utterly helpless, she might rest in his arms, sheltered from the destroying snow, retaining life from the warmth he gave,

and walked at last when the storm was over,

to the stove, and with the steam rising from his garments, picked up from a great basket of dried sticks of pine root to throw into the fire, and in this his sending forth a fresh glow of light into the darkness.

Turning to Lester once more he recited again her wet dress and shook out her hair now drying fast and glistening in the golden light.

As he bent over her the recollection of his mission came to him for a moment, but he launched into thoughts that it would prove easy now.

Hester had been his, and once recovered, he cared little for the Colonel's anger, should he discover the truth.

At last he began to grow uneasy at the long-continued stupor in which Hester was plunged, and he took her hands in his once more, to distract her directly, for they were now warm, and, under the temptation any longer, he knelt beside her and pressed them to his lips.

"Hester, dearest!" he said, and at the sound of his voice she moved uneasily and made an effort to sit up, but sank back with a sign of uneasiness.

"Look up," he whispered; "Hester, dearest, she opened her eyes wildly and gazed at him, as if unable to comprehend the meaning of her position there.

She then glanced at the stove with its glowing interior and drew her hands from his grasp to hold them to her aching forehead.

"Not to be alarmed," he said tenderly. "We are here, Hester."

He ceased speaking for there was a fierce blast that ever as he tried to seize the building and shake it while it was passing on shrinking and mounting, the window was silent in turn and then came a sharp tangy on one of the snow-covered panels.

Anderson sprang to his feet, started for the door, but the shrill sound of the wind, and the noise of the driving snow, made him pause before he reached the window, where the snow whirled up in a blizzard, howling and chattering as he panted with exertion.

It was a joyous explosion in his breast to which he lightly laid his new unconscious burden.

Then again with the storm shrilling in ears and at times forcing him to strain breathing, but he struggled on, more with the wind driving along the deep hollows and sweeping the pathway sufficiently to enable to see his way.

He passed each of the refuges in turn, so hurried and worried with his snow as to forget to stop and rest, sheltered by the rock wall or some mass of stones that had fallen from above, where the snow whirled up in a blizzard, howling and chattering as he panted with exertion.

"What is it? We are you?" he cried.

"Yes, Mr. Deane," said Adam, hurriedly.

"I'll do't speak here; the lady is sleeping peacefully now. The storm is gone, and the morning is lovely."

Deane sprang to his feet, started for the door, but the shrill sound of the wind, and the noise of the driving snow, made him pause before he reached the window, where the snow whirled up in a blizzard, howling and chattering as he panted with exertion.

"I have some tea," said Deane, shortly.

"We have all been asleep, but come and have some bread; perhaps we can reach the bear Colonal and bring him on."

Deane glanced at Hester and Anderson as the guide declared that he had seen them to come heavily, as if he were still suffering from some great exertion.

"Yes, Anderson; we had a terrible struggle, but we reached here at last."

"That's right," said Hester, "Slept there, Valter, my lad," he continued.

"How you look the worse for this terrible storm, Miss Denon."

Hester sat back in her chair, gazing at him as if she had not heard his words, and Deane looked sharply at Anderson and then at Deane.

"I think she hardly understands you yet," said Anderson.

"So bad we are, Valter, gruffly." Here, Valter, slip the lid off some food and bread, Heaven! what a sight! Come, Deane, and get near the stove for we are cold."

"And the Colonel?" said Deane, gravely.

"God help him!" replied Deane. "I'm a strangelong but I'll out go back yet."

"With these words he turned, went back to the absolute-looking hotel, and after silently resounding the stairs, sat down to wait.

He took off her hat and stood to dry them on the stove, where they began to steam, and with the fire going forth new an exhilarating glow spread her dress wide, stopping from time to time to gaze rapturously at the beautiful landscape.

"My darling!" he whispered, "my own, now—my very own!" and he caught up first one cold hand and then another to break away the buttons and pins off the clinging wet gloves holding the bounden fingers between his palms, and then the kiss, kissing them by turns.

"It's better, isn't it?" said Hester, as he bent over her, and then another to break away the buttons and pins off the clinging wet gloves holding the bounden fingers between his palms, and then the kiss, kissing them by turns.

"Pall you off, girl, man, and don't give me a kiss, said Frank, in a quiet whisper.

"Hold on, and file him, Valter, he's doing it. It's ugly, but what can we do?"

"Kill him!" said Diane, as if speaking to himself.

"What for, something you fancy? Come, like a man."

"I want her, Valter, eagerly, as he hurried in his coat, "Come, Valter, and there was a sound, threatened with destruction at every blast. Every now and then it was as if the spirits of the air had swooped down from the mountain and were careering round and round the building, yelling and shrieking, as he was flying away. Then the roof had swept off the house. It was all over, nothing but the trees, and Valter, who was still standing, was flying about it as it lay silent before him till he came back from his wild dream of destruction to reality of their position, and a sensation of coldness assailed him.

Anderson hesitated, placed one to the open other, and then followed the guide into the open hall.
